Most Common Farm Implement in Ireland: It depends on the farm, but the spade was the single most common implement and existed on the smallest farm. In Ireland there was great local variety in spades, which were particularly adapted to potato cultivation and the making of cultivation ridges. Two-sided spades spread from the north and east and were mainly produced in spade mills. One sided 'loys' were more common in the west and south-west and were mainly produced by blacksmiths. Only the two-sided variety are now made. Special spades called 'slanes' were also produced for cutting peat for fuel.
